7.3 Current research activities

Working as a project leader for research projects entitled:

- The significance of studying phospholipids and fatty acid composition in the diagnosis and control of equine hyperlipaemia

The project will present information on the significance of studying phospholipids and fatty acids composition in the diagnosis of equine hyperlipaemia. We also focus on gaps in our knowledge about the appropriate treatment protocols that could be maintained to control and minimize the risk of hyperlipaemia in donkeys (2 Students enrolled in the project and obtained M.V.M.) (Received fund from Scientific Research Deanship, SUST).

- Some pharmacotoxic aspects of ivermectin injectable formulation in donkeys (Equus asinus).

The project will present information on the possible toxic and side effects of higher doses of ivermectin injectable formulation in donkeys. Animals are to be subjected to stress factors such as fasting and/or heavy helminths parasitic infestations and will be monitored for changes in blood constituents (One student enrolled in the project and obtained M.V.M.) (Received fund from Ministry of Higher Education, Sudan).

- Evaluation of some selected intravenous anaesthetic protocols for use in donkeys

The project will present information on the suitable anaesthetic protocols that could be used under field conditions pertaining to surgical intervention in donkeys and the suitable pre-anaesthetic medication to be administered and the side and/or adverse effects, if any. We also focus on gaps in our knowledge about the appropriate treatment protocols that could be maintained to control and minimize the risk of injectable anaesthesia in donkeys. (Two M.Sc. and one Ph. D. Student enrolled in the project; one student obtained M.V.M.)

- Comparative efficacy, persistent effect, and treatment intervals of anthelmintics in naturally infected donkeys

The main problems which affect donkeys' health in Sudan are helminths infestation especially in remote areas. The question should be raised in this respect is that how the owners protect their animals for determined period from helminths? To address this problem in the absence of information concerning persistent effect of anthelmintics suitable for tropical and subtropical conditions justify evaluation of the commonly used anthelmintics under field conditions in the proposed study. (One M.Sc. student and two Ph. D. Student enrolled in the project, one student obtained M.V.M.)
